

Commercial trade waste

Important information for your food business

What is commercial trade waste?

It's the wastewater that goes into the sewer from your food business, when you clean and sanitise things like utensils, containers, benches, floors and bins.

Why you need a trade waste consent

If you have a Class 1, 2, or 3 food business in our service area discharging trade waste, you'll need a commercial trade waste consent. We manage and treat trade waste to prevent sewer blockages, spills, health hazards, and environmental impacts. We're here to protect our sewerage system.

How to get a trade waste consent

Submit your application. We'll assess your trade waste. If it's pre-treated properly with a suitable food and oil interceptor, you're good to go!

Why the food and oil interceptor?

This device, sometimes called a grease trap, is required by your trade waste consent, and helps prevent sewer blockages. It's a tank that catches food particles, fats, oil, and grease before they enter the sewer. By slowing down waste flow, it allows fats, oil, and grease to float up and particles to settle on the bottom. These substances get caught in the interceptor and build up over time.

It's your job to arrange to have the interceptor pumped out by your waste transporter at the frequency specified in your trade waste consent. This ensures it continues to work effectively and helps to prevent sewer blockages. We'll monitor these pump outs and send reminders when it's overdue.

The commercial trade waste consent helps protect the sewerage system.

Why the trade waste charges?

These charges help us manage your trade waste consents. Here's what they cover:

- Making sure businesses have consents and right-sized interceptors.
- Inspections of new and existing interceptors.
- Monitoring interceptor maintenance and pump-out frequency.

- Admin tasks like phone calls and reminders for overdue interceptor maintenance.
- Investigations into non-compliance.
- Checking sewer blockages or spills related to fats, oil, and grease.
